If so, further molecular investigation is warranted. For instance, with the recent identification of c-Myc as a novel partner of JAK2 in HES cell lines ([@B26]), these cells could undergo double oncogenic transformation of JAK2 and c-Myc. In fact, this type of alteration has been described in rare cases of MPN in the original IPSS/WHO classification ([@B27]). Furthermore, there have been two recent reports showing that double fusions of *JAK2* with *PML*/*RARA* ([@B25]) and *JAK2* with *TEL/JAK1* ([@B28]) might be present in some cases of DEB-MPN. These double or triple fusions provide new data on the plasticity of a cellular system, which may be used to explain the progression and outcome of the disease. In addition to genetically detectable causes, non-genetic factors may also be responsible for the clonal evolution and disease progression. For example, in
