Windows XP .Nursing home residents' and their relatives' experiences of a reciprocal family caregiving model. The purpose of this study was to investigate how families of frail older persons in Swedish nursing homes experience family caregiving and how they describe the model of reciprocal family caregiving as experienced within their homes. The participants were 25 family caregivers and 22 older persons from one nursing home. Data were collected through interviews and were analysed using thematic analysis.

Two main themes were found: interplay between giving and receiving and feeling safe. Giving and receiving were related to caring for others.

Giving and receiving meant the experience of the reciprocal relationship between the older person's family and the nursing home staff. Feeling safe was related to freedom from care. The findings in this study show that reciprocal family caregiving and care in nursing homes are both crucial and complex. Reciprocal family caregiving can be described as an interplay between giving and receiving. The nursing home staff are crucial in the giving and receiving process and their support can be used as an instrument for family caregiving. In the cooling of refrigerators and air-conditioning, a refrigerant from a compressor is compressed in a condenser and the compressed gas cools while heat is removed from the gas in the condenser. The cooled and dehumidified gas is then routed to an expansion valve. The expansion valve (also called an expansion device, an electronic expansion valve, or an inverter) turns off the flow of the refrigerant, and thus de-pressures the gas. The pressure of the gas now falls, causing the gas to cool in an evaporator. The low-pressure, cool refrigerant then goes back to the compressor, causing a refrigeration cycle, or cooling cycle. In high-efficiency cooling systems (about 70% to 80% efficiency is typical), the refrigerant enters the high-efficiency system as a liquid (refrigerant XR-
